Dear Lord Bonomy, I am a farmer's wife whose mixed farm is in the Scottish Borders. We have ewes lambing at this moment and it is vital that the fox population is controlled. Due to the large areas of woodland and rough areas where foxes lie, it is essential to use a pack of hounds to flush foxes to the guns. The suggestion of using two hounds for this purpose is impractical and just would not work. I follow hounds on horseback myself but there are many stiers on foot who deliver please not only from watching but the camaraderie of being in our beautiful countryside with other like-minded people.

Our countryside means everything to me, but farmers have got to make a living which is why I think the Protection of Wild Mammals (Scotland) Act 2002 should stay as is.

Yours sincerely
Senga Tweedie
